Tim Carmody, Toronto Sun THE SUN has learned that the developer that holds the rights to Toronto's John Street is in talks with those who want to build a Chinatown in the heart of the city, but it's a delicate situation for the developer, which holds the rights to the contentious site. John Street Development Corp., a sister company to Distraction Architecture, is one of three developers wanting to build a new Chinatown on the site at Gerrard and John streets. Distraction itself is a subsidiary of Elad Canada, an Israel-based company that already has three major developments in the works in Toronto. The John Street site is one of them. Elad Canada acquired the land from John Street Development Corp. in May 2010, through a number of shell corporations, for $8.5 million, according to land title records. The developer bought the property, which is zoned residential, for $3 million just three years earlier. The site has long been a thorn in the side of city council. A Chinese community that wanted to build a Chinatown at the site in the 1980s lost out to a major condo development, which came after the city altered the zoning to allow for a mixed commercial-residential use
