They are generally associated with something being "hidden" rather than you just wanting to download it, that's why you're having issues downloading a.rar. You need to download a.zip instead. A novel gap junctional communication system: the connexons of spermatozoa. Spermatozoa are highly specialized cells that have to be able to respond to stimuli from their microenvironment in order to develop motility and fertilization of an oocyte. These stimuli are supposed to be conveyed in at least two ways: (a) an action potential current through the nerve fiber cell membrane, and (b) a chemical signal through paracrine/autocrine mechanisms. Here we describe a novel form of junctional communication that allows for (a) direct electrical and (b) fast paracrine effects. Electrically, spermatozoa are linked by gap junctional complexes or connexons that allow a fast (millisecond) action potential signal to be transferred from one cell to another. The connexons of spermatozoa were able to conduct the action potential signal, but not the much slower gap junctional communication. Here we describe the biophysical properties of the connexon of spermatozoa. The connexon of spermatozoa has two different forms: a fusiform and a hexagonal conformation. There is a correlation between the function of the connexon and its conformation. The fusiform connexon of spermatozoa appears to transmit an action potential signal, whereas the hexagonal connexon does not. This functional conformation of the connexon appears to be regulated by protein phosphorylation. We propose that the hexagonal connexon of spermatozoa is the only connexin in spermatozoa that does not allow intercellular transfer of the action potential signal. Instead, the hexagonal connexon of spermatozoa forms a fast paracrine communication system with connexons of oocyte in order to provide the spermatozoa with information about the microenvironment in which it will be released.
