Creating a Scale Bar in Excel and PowerPoint makes your data more visual and easier to understand. Some of the most common ways to create a scale bar are demonstrated in this video: based on bar charts, linear scales, or using PowerPoint presentation. In addition to creating a "vanity" folder and installing your favorite Web Development tools (1), I would suggest you consider setting up a document management system on your Web server and share these folders. This way, you can easily search and deploy your new work using the built-in features of your favorite Web Development tools. By the way, do you know how to create a Windows shortcut and tell the file to open in a new IE window? Deriving from CFrameWnd, CToasterWnd is an MFC class that enables you to design notification windows similar to the ones displayed by MSN Messenger while putting at your disposal a multitude of customizations you could turn to. The software utility enables you to handle the body and title text of a toast window along with the icon. Aside from that, multiple options are provided in terms of fonts, layout, and background color. Users may also be interested to know that support for vertical, horizontal, and diagonal background styles is offered, but you can also opt for a plain solid appearance. If this is something you may want to apply, the GDI function GradientFill should enable you to effortlessly carry out the task. Other than that, CToasterWnd allows you to indicate how long the window remains visible, whether user control is required in order to close it, as well as the impact of mouse hover. As for the animations you can turn to, four different options are offered in this regard. As such, the window can pop up, down, to the left, or to the right, and you also have the possibility of letting it detect the most suitable choice by analyzing the position of the taskbar. CToasterWnd includes many other features that allow you to come up with eye-catching notification windows that might remind of MSN Messenger, with a demo application being integrated in its archive in order to demonstrate some of its capabilities. [Read more]A new study has found that the brains of people with Parkinson's disease, who are at an increased risk of dementia, are 10 times more likely than those without Parkinson's disease to be wired for Alzheimer's disease, or even for autism. The brain wiring that was linked to Alzheimer's in the study, published today in the journal Frontiers in Neuroscience, was described as 'strikingly similar' to the brain anatomy associated with autism spectrum disorders. "That was really surprising to us," says Dr Ann Giuffrida, from the University of California, Los Angeles. "We thought we might see some small overlap between Parkinson's disease and Alzheimer's disease. Instead we found that Parkinson's patients were 10 times more likely to have Alzheimer's or autism." Giuffrida and her colleagues did not know if the brain wiring they discovered was a cause or a consequence of Alzheimer's and autism. They suggest it may be the cause, as it is the same wiring that is found in people with those disorders. It may also make sense, the team says, that these patients would be more likely to have Alzheimer's and autism as the brain's wiring is damaged during Alzheimer's and autism. It's also possible that the same exact wiring changes that lead to Alzheimer's and autism also lead to Parkinson's, the team says. At least 1 in 10 people over 65 have Alzheimer's and it is the biggest cause of dementia. The
