I'm reading Why we have three years in America by Paul Krugman and have a question on this sentence: One purpose of deregulation is to achieve greater efficiency and lower prices everywhere you go, and in every sector of the economy. The sentence in question comes from page 5 in this pdf. I think the word wherever in the sentence is misleading, because elsewhere in the book, Krugman wrote that this is essentially what "repeal" of regulations would do: "Regulations are the key to what it is like to live in America today." Every time you dig a hole, you're digging into a sea of red tape. Government is not only unproductive; it's downright wasteful. If you look at this rhetorical definition of "red tape", this is what the abstract of the book says: In Regulation, Krugman traces a process of change in the regulation of the economy, from its early beginnings in the New Deal era to its current state, where its operations are pervasive, and not easily understood. The author explains that it is "red tape" in the sense of "regulation" that "is a family of edicts and prohibitions that burden society without supplying anything commensurate with the cost" (36). I don't understand where "everywhere" refers to in the sentence above, unless it's referring to in the sense that you go to somewhere to do something? But it doesn't make sense because "everywhere" is already introduced as "whenever" in the book. So I think the word wherever in the sentence above is not referring to in the sense of "wherever", and I'm wondering where it actually refers to.
