When they treated him as such, to what extent did he believe them? In what way did he assess his parents in his mind? In what light did he look at them and what did he say to himself? From what world of imaginary creatures do they come? And what are the implications of the phrase 'worth their weight of gold'? Here is what I have understood so far: By this time he was very conscious that he was a clone. A clone of what? How does one become aware of being a clone? I suppose he had not been treated like a clone till that point, and only became aware of it when they started treating him like a clone. From what world of imaginary creatures do they come? I guess Huxley is saying that what the world of imaginary creatures is, is, in fact, the world in which this type of person comes from. Is this correct? If not, what do you understand? And what are the implications of the phrase "worth their weight of gold"? So the words 'worth' and 'gold' obviously mean something. Presumably what it means is that, in proportion to the weight of the people they were, they had 82138339dc
