I am not sure why you want to do this, but it has been done before. I would recommend looking into Haskell. Haskell is a functional programming language that is based around lots of mathematical ideas. I used it for my PhD and it really helped me to cut through a lot of the unnecessary detail in what was otherwise a confusing subject. If you want to recreate the same effect, you will have to use the LaTeX \includegraphics command. The \includegraphics command takes a list of the images you want to include, followed by the string (type \includegraphics[val=]{.pdf}, is the name of the file, but the filename may be in any format that LaTeX uses) A good way of using \includegraphics in LaTeX is to create a separate folder with your thumbnails (or whatever image you are using) and put them in there. Have a look at the PDF of the book, I uploaded it, and you can see some examples. It would be quite useful to include some example PDF's of your images. Also, most images will be sub-sampled, so you may want to include a PDF of the original image. The following are the things you can do: Create a master folder (with the images) Create a sample PDF (so that you know how the PDF should be formatted, so that you can copy the template) Create a template (copy the first page of the PDF) Create the presentation and include the template (using the template, not the original PDF) Just create a folder containing the images for the presentation (add the images to the templates) Download the document (can be done using any online link where you can download the PDF) Open the presentation (which will have the images) To see the size of the images, you can also open it with a PDF reader.
