00feaf:When designing large scale products such as jet engines, and the like, it is sometimes desirable to ensure that the product is capable of withstanding extreme conditions. In the case of jet engines, these conditions may include very high temperatures and pressures, high radiation, or the like. In addition, such products often have multiple components which interact with each other and/or environment, so it is desirable to be able to couple components which are, or will be, in contact with each other or in close proximity to each other, to ensure that any gaps in the interface are well sealed. In some cases, however, achieving the desired performance is hampered by the fact that the interface between two components needs to be exposed to high temperature and/or high pressure environments for long periods of time. For example, in the case of a jet engine, many of the components of such a jet engine are exposed to high temperatures and pressures, such as high temperature and high pressure combustion and turbine components, in addition to high temperature and high pressure bearing assemblies, and the like. To reduce the potential for leakage, the interface between the components should be hermetic and well sealed, particularly in the case of interfaces where the components are held together by high pressure materials, since these high pressure materials are subject to high pressures and temperatures and are used to create strong interfacial forces. In the case of cast high pressure parts, such as, for example, nozzle and turbine cases, the casting process is typically used to form the interface between two components. In this case, however, there is a risk that the interface between the two components may be formed in a manner which does not give a desired hermetic and/or a desired sealed interface. There is a continuing need for a better way to form interfaces between two components of a product, particularly in the case of high pressure components. Massive petechial rash on the buttocks of a 40-year-old woman. We report the case of a 40-year-old woman who presented with a massive bleeding petechial rash on the left buttock. She was first treated in a local hospital without any benefit, despite the spontaneous bruising. A few days later, she had a second, more generalised bleeding at another emergency department. Concerning this second bleeding, there was no macroscopic sign of rectal haemorrhage but only petechiae on her lower limbs. A comprehensive hospitalisation and a blood tests search for coagulopathy has been performed but d0c515b9f4
