Once the data is collected, the technology is used in creating player types, ball control and speed, ball physics, acceleration, player reactions, ball interaction (on-surface accuracy), player recovery, fatigue, and much more. MORE: HyperMotion Technology The best part about HyperMotion Technology is that it doesn't just apply to the on-field aspect of FIFA, but also in the pre-match and post-match environments as well. In the pre-match, the HyperMotion Technology is used to create a player type that best fits a player's movements and behaviour in the pre-match simulation and boosts match-flow and entertainment. In the post-match simulation, HyperMotion technology is also used to create a best-fit player type to best match the player's style and behaviour. "We are all happy to be the first step to make all players' action and behaviour fully synthetic. For us it's important to use any technology and our players' body motion to avoid the unnatural feel that players have in real life," said Carlos

“Crixtas” Marchena, FIFA Lead Producer. “With HyperMotion technology it’s the first time we have such a simulation for all player type and all gameplay situations in FIFA, including off-field user interactions.” “HyperMotion technology makes a massive difference to our on-field and off-field gameplay; it’s a real-life experience for our players, it’s fantastic for the community and it’s the right step forward for our FIFA series for the future.” said Stephan Mchaourab, CEO at EA SPORTS. Chris Richards, EA’s Chief Technology Officer, added that players will be able to identify themselves in FIFA by their on-field play style. “In prior versions of our FIFA games we worked very hard to create the feel of the sport on-field. The challenge to create in real-life is immense and we’re excited about bringing the full capability of real-life player body movement to our game,” Richards said. “We started this journey a year ago with Player Impact Engine and are continuing to push the limits of our technology as we look to next year’s release of FIFA ‘PES’.” Please note: The above video has been slowed down to give
