Luminescent devices are for example used in lamps for determining the brightness of headlights of vehicles, and in various other embodiments. Lamps for motor vehicles can be actuated in such a manner that they produce a characteristic light emission only at the moment when the vehicle starts moving and at the moment when the driver asks for the illumination of the lamp. This characteristic light emission is used as an indicator of the actuation of the lamp. For this purpose, the illumination of the lamp should be so low that the movement of the vehicle cannot be detected in the photoreceiver. It is furthermore known to use a device for monitoring the luminous intensity emitted from the lamp, and to feed this information to the lamp driver. In
