I recently bought a copy of AutoCAD 2010. I was shocked to see the price, $3,400. I understand that the program is worth every penny, but the sticker shock was a little bit disturbing. Can anyone provide some insight on how much the average CAD manager spends on the software? Thanks for the help, DG A: This is a very subjective question and very hard to answer with some quantitative numbers. People spend a lot of money on other things in their life, and the same holds for CAD software. Some people spend a lot of money on coffee while others buy new shoes every week. Nobody can give a general number, but I can give you some numbers for myself. I bought a copy of AutoCAD 2006 for $1,200. I am still using it to this day and I think about it as the best piece of software I have ever bought. I sold my first copy of AutoCAD 2007 for over $1,000 and the new version of 2008 was something like $1,500. I bought the current version for $1,200. To me that is a very good deal, but then again, the people who bought a copy of 2007, and hassles of updating from 2006 to 2007, were probably not willing to pay that amount for it. It just depends on what you want to do and how much do you value stability and support. In general, the software itself is just a piece of software. The real value lies with the people who wrote the software and the people that use it. In that regard, I would invest into better hardware and CAD software, because it is the real long term investment. A: Ok, so I'll give it a go. One thing you should know is that, with respect to CAD software, there is currently a big change in business practices. Large projects are run by teams, and there's a school of thought that the main software in use for documenting the project is VCS (Version Control System). This is typically something like, say, Perforce, SourceForge, or SVN. There are other tools used, but this is the one that's most common. When companies do that, CAD in general becomes part of the VCS. And that's a new thing, and it's expensive. If your company does that, then you'll be paying through the nose for AutoCAD, right?
