In the field of magnetic resonance imaging, gradient coils are used to apply varying magnetic fields along the three axes of a Cartesian coordinate system to generate gradients in the space in which a patient is disposed. In current systems, gradient coils are typically designed as a set of loops arranged along a first axis (A-O) and a set of loops arranged along a second axis (O-I) perpendicular to the first axis and perpendicular to the axis of the coil windings, or a set of loops arranged along a third axis (I-S) perpendicular to the first two axes. The currents flowing through the loops are set to particular values so as to generate desired magnetic fields. Typically, in order to design a gradient coil, the maximum current that can be passed through the coil is divided into two or three steps, so that the coil is overdesigned for the lowest current step and underdesigned for the highest current step. This is done so as to not drive the coil beyond the maximum capacity of the coil supply. However, because the lowest current step is overdesigned, the coil has not been designed to operate efficiently. When the current in the coil reaches the maximum current, the coil has to work harder to develop the desired magnetic field, since the coil turns are already fully activated. Therefore, the coils cannot use all of their available energy, because the coil does not operate near the optimum level. The
