Fibers come in two basic varieties: single-mode fibers and multi-mode fibers. Single-mode fibers, the most commonly used, transmit light that has only one wavelength and a diameter of about 9 micrometers; multi-mode fibers can transmit light of varying wavelengths and diameters, and have diameters of about 55 micrometers. Fiber optic cabling typically consists of several hundred or thousands of fibers bundled together into a cable. The cable is sheathed in a protective outer jacket and may include one or more strength members. Optic fibers run the length of the cable. A typical cable may contain from about a hundred to a few thousand optical fibers. Optical fiber, in combination with a laser emitter, is commonly used for the transmission of digital data. FIBER OPTIC CABLES are already being used for a variety of applications including, but not limited to, broadband ISDN and other broadband communications, video and data distribution, CATV and home networking, cable modem use, and internal LANs. Optical fiber typically has superior transmission characteristics as compared to copper wire; however, the transmission system must be installed correctly to minimize attenuation. The transmission system is also vulnerable to faults which may require immediate repair. Cable networks must allow for the rapid restoration of communications in the event of a power failure. Cable television service providers are increasingly utilizing fiber to the home networks to provide faster Internet access. Optical fiber cables are typically constructed such that the fiber is held in place by a resin that has been extruded over the fibers. The extruded resin holds the fibers while making a final splice of the optical fiber or the cable. This cable construction is commonly referred to as the "prepreg" method. The length of the cable is wrapped with a multitude of layers of protective 6d1f23a050
