new york city has a ton of great coffee places. barista serves the best in the city. theyre incredibly comfortable too, with high-backed barstools and a lot of industrial, brick walls and cement. good coffee at barista is pretty much a must. theres a seasonal case, and here we are in october. wtf? anyway, of all the coffee places in the city, barista is by far the most comfortable. there are leather booths and a variety of tables, and if youre sitting at the bar and have a problem with your cup, you can look through a window to see what the baristas up at the counter are doing. the ability to decode a pattern after 2 or 3 repeats, while keeping the data coherent is a great asset when editing drum hits, and also applicable to synthetic drums/sounds. the issue of any rhythm-based editor is when and how many repeats of a particular pattern the user of the software would like to edit to avoid repeating the entire pattern more than once. a common situation occurs when the user knows the exact start and end of the edit, but would like to not have the data repeat more than once. now, some of these methods are based on absolute numbers, but you can also use relative numbers to find the root of any problem. for example, if there is no consistency, break away for a couple of months, and the 'whipped' sounds have returned, then this is clear; that a break caused the problem. unlike eq, this method works like an algorithm which can be changed with ease. some of the sounds are original sounds and some of them are edited that use a couple of different drum kits. not all of them have been fully patched yet. "i've also mixed the already released generic and original "bird sounds" misterio"s music. an interpretation of the songs of the group the mechanical birds. it was a challenging project with a huge musical range; from the heaviest black metal to ambient sounds. however, mixing is not my natural tool; every kind of track requires something special. it's a challenge, but i try to enjoy it.
