well, theres one way to do it. you can set up your computer to use your home wi-fi name (sid) as it's ssid (wireless name), and have it act as a virtual access point, broadcasting your home network's security key over the air (via a broadcast). then, you can connect to your computer just like you would to an access point. the easy solution is to use the network manager app. (i am referring to wifi directly, as something like the sid application and other tools built for 802.11x management will likely have similar functionality.) if you haven't already gotten into this habit, it's time to start doing it. wingle uses the ssid and encryption mechanism of the network, so the name you give the hotspot can be whatever you want it to be. the only requirement is that if it is a security feature, it can only be a string of numbers, letters, hyphens, and underscores. this is because the name is used to associate the wireless network with the wireless client, it is not used as a security feature, so you want it to be unique. if you want to set up wingle, you need to go into the network manager app or similar and choose a name for your virtual access point. this is the name that you will broadcast, and the name you will need in wingle to connect to it. some wifi clients can connect to it, though. if you configure your hotspot correctly, it will be able to authenticate as a wi-fi hotspot that has the same name as the network. if you configure it to use wpa2-aes with a default password like password, it should be able to authenticate to most commercial hotspots (for example, as long as you're in a populated area), though it is not compatible with airports.
