Hours: 4 semester hours (includes lab) Instructor Name and Contact Information: Dr. Arifa.The invention relates to a method for damping a first vibration of a first structure relative to a second structure which is connected to the first structure.

Furthermore, the invention relates to a method for damping a first vibration of a first structure relative to a second structure which is connected to the first structure, wherein, in an unloaded state, the first structure exhibits a first resonance frequency in a first frequency range, and a second resonance frequency in a second frequency range. Furthermore, the invention relates to a method for damping a first vibration of a first structure relative to a second structure which is connected to the first structure, wherein, in an unloaded state, the first structure exhibits a first resonance frequency in a first frequency range and a second resonance frequency in a second frequency range and which second frequency range is offset by a defined offset frequency from the first resonance frequency. In the production of electronic components, vibrations can appear that are caused, for example, by welding or handling, with the result that the first structure exhibits a vibration in the form of oscillations in a first frequency range that are superimposed on a second structure to be coupled, which second structure is connected to the first structure. Consequently, the first structure exhibits a first resonance frequency in the first frequency range and a second resonance frequency in a second frequency range which is offset by a defined offset frequency from the first resonance frequency, by which means the first structure exhibits an antiresonance frequency in the first frequency range. Furthermore, vibrations can occur in a workpiece in the form of oscillations which are caused, for example, by a hammer striking the workpiece or by a motor being driven, and which oscillations reach the first structure and cause it to exhibit oscillations in the first frequency range. The resonant oscillations can have undesired effects on the operation of the first structure and can lead to a reduction in the component quality, to a failure of the component or to an increased wear of the component. It is therefore desirable to damp the first vibrations that occur, and it is known from the prior 04aeff104c
