Acute ischemic stroke is mainly caused by a proximal arterial occlusion and associated severe ischemic injury. However, recent studies have documented that a distal arterial occlusion can also be associated with hemorrhagic transformation of ischemic infarcts and result in a poor outcome. The underlying mechanism responsible for this late stage of occlusion-induced secondary injury of the ischemic brain tissue is unknown. The purpose of this study was to examine whether endothelial injury of the microvasculature occurs during the early phase of ischemic stroke in both the penumbral and core area and contributes to cerebral edema. Both MRI and laser-Doppler techniques were used to monitor acute changes in cerebral blood flow (CBF) and vascular permeability. In addition, FITC-dextran was used to assess vascular permeability after distal middle cerebral artery occlusion. Using laser-Doppler flowmetry, we detected an early reduction in CBF in the penumbral region starting 1 day after the onset of occlusion. There was a significant correlation between the CBF value and the volume of edema. The ischemic penumbra was histologically characterized by the vacuolization of astrocytes and oligodendrocytes. The apoptotic cell death was most prominent in the penumbra. The capillaries, in both the penumbral and core area, were damaged by the ischemic insult. Increases in vascular permeability were seen in the penumbral area starting on the first day of ischemia. The cell damage in the penumbra and the vascular injury in the capillaries can be detected starting from the early phase of ischemic stroke. These pathophysiological events may contribute to the early and late infarct development. Drills, assemblies and tools have been made by using a metal binder. For example, a drill having continuous fillets of copper extending along a surface of the drill bit has been made by combining copper wire or copper tubing and copper powder. The copper powder is compressed around the copper wire or the copper tubing to bind the tube to the drill. Such a metal
